Comments:

The acceptance criteria proposed in section A3.8.3 that requires passing a Class B burning brand test on skylights with a non-metallic frame is punitive and prejudicial against retainer frames made from thermoplastics such as aliphatic polyurethane. We have tested metal framed skylights under the Class B burning brand test protocol and they have failed as well. The issue is not the combustibility of the frame, but rather the height of the 4" curb used for the test. The flames from the brand bypass the retainer frame and ignite the plastic directly. The requirement for a Class B burning brand test should not single out non-metallic frames under these circumstances. The only fair policy to enact would be to either require all skylights to pass this test or rescind the requirement for non-metallic framed skylights to be subjected to it.
